Coffee & Tee

The Duane Reade cashier continues her conversation while ringing you up. Your dentist forgets your name between visits. The lady who pedicures your feet doesn't make eye contact. Living in the world capital of anonymity, where mild rudeness is the default setting, one can start to feel invisible.

This, in part, is why New Yorkers love our corner coffee-truck guys. Line up at the same one before work each day, and he'll single you out: "There you are, beautiful!" (even when you look anything but). He'll hand your medium-coffee-skim-two-Splendas through the window before you even ask for it. You'll walk away feeling important, and even a little smug when you spot a Starbucks. "We Are Happy to Serve You!" declares the blue-and-gold, Greek-themed paper cup.

So while your Midwestern relatives might be confused by Baby New Yorker's concept, you will totally get it. They've put the city's iconic coffee cup design onto cotton onesies (in the shape of a baby bottle), and two-tone tees for toddlers (in the shape of a sippy cup). Once only available at the Union Square Market during warmer months, the designs are now sold in the city year-round. They're the perfect shower gift for a NYC ex-pat.

And bring your baby around town in one, and your pedicurist might just crack a smile.
